

September the 15th 2008 is the International Freedom in Education Day.

There are many places in the World, for example [your country], where citizens cannot enjoy their right to choose freely the way to educate their children. In [your country], although the Constitution recongnizes in its article [##] the freedom in education, [any other regulation applicable to your country], the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in its article 26 [and any judicial sentence or law of precedent you could have in your country] emphasizes on this right of freedom in education, we still need the institutions and the Society have a greater understanding about the different alternatives we can choose besides the conventional system. Alternatives based in respect, empathy and the seeking for Knowledge.

A type of education whose final aim is to achieve our children becoming in independent adults, capable and, over all, happy.

For all these, we claim the administration and the public institutions to recongnize our right to free educate our children and we demand [any other demand you could have, for example, in Spain: to replace the tests to access higher education with no age limit.]

We also demand from the Society to stop criminalizing parents that have choosen to use their right and, consciously are educating their children at home.

During the weekend September 14th-15th there will be a broad series of events around [your country] in order to inform and make aware the Society about the existence and the need to promote free education.

Asociación para la Libre Educación

www.educacionlibre.org